DOMESTIC VIRTUES APPEAL TO A MAN

Average Mortal Usually Uses Term in Describing His Ideal.

DOES NOT COMPRISE ALL THAT IS NEEDED

Wife Is Rarely Selected for Her Traits of Character.

The average man, in describing his ideal woman, almost always declare that she must be endowed, first of all, with the "domestic virtues." Asked to describe these, he grow vague and misty of ideas, and mutter something about his mother. As a matter of fact, of course, no ma selects his wife for her traits of character, but rather for some trick of the eyebrows or some wave of the hair which commends itself to him as attractive. Then, after he has chosen her in this enlightened and far-seeing fashion, he expects her to be endowed with the disposition of a saint and the house-keeping ability of a Martha.

"Domestic virtues" is a term which may mean anything when it is used by a man. It may mean that his wife is expected to be able to find the hammer when he wishes it, no matter how skillselects his wife for her traits of char when he wishes it, no matter how skill-fully he has hidden it, or it may mean that he expects his hosiery always to be in perfect repair, or that his dinner must be ready whenever he comes home, be that at 5:30 or at 7:30, and always hot and never spoiled.

"Domestic virtues" in a woman, usually mean to a man a modest, retiring disposition, gay when he feels like being gay or subdued when he feels that he prefers to be quiet. It means that she must prefer his society to all comers, even if she is only permitted to sit in the room with him, but not to address him on pain of his displeagure.

Once I knew a very amlable lady who had in a large measure the domestic virtues. She was wooed and won for these by a clever man, who said to an intimate friend that he preferred a woman not to be too intellectual. Intellectuality, he said, was the prerogative of man, and he wanted no rivals in his own household; he wanted as a wife a womanly woman who would see that things were kept in order, and whose chief literature would be Mrs. Somebody-or-Other's cook book.

An Attentive Wife.

Republic is that the women were quite as courageous as the men, and as only a few lower class men evinced fear this is all that any woman could ask for Intellect as the latter any woman could ask for Intellect as a few lower class men evinced fear this is all that any woman could ask for Intellect as courageous as the men, and as only a few lower class men evinced fear this is all that any woman could ask for Intellect as the latter any woman could ask for Intellect as the latter any woman could ask for Intellect as courageous as the men, and as only a few lower class men evinced fear this is all that any woman could ask for Intellect as the latter any woman could ask for Intellect as the latter, and the variety, but makes the variety, but mestic virtues. She was wooed and won for these by a clever man, who said to an intimate friend that he preferred a woman not to be too intellectual. Intellectuality, he said, was the preforgative of man, and he wanted no rivals in the famous silver media. The fact as a watch pecket of the high swatch pecket of the high swatch pecket of the high. An Attentive Wife.

And, as I have said, he married her, and his home was very comfortable. There was no burned beefsteak in it, and never a poor cup of coffee. More than that, the curtains were laundered at regular intervals, and the rungs of the chairs were eternally dusted, which sounds like a fairy tale but is She was an attentive wife, this Martha, and stayed at home in the evenings as becomes a good and faithful ! elpmate, and crocheted table

Then the exigencies of public life placed the man in a position of prominence, where his wife had to mingle with women of the world and had to that at least there has not been such a one since the word "suffragette was coined. I must mildly but firmly inisst that I know him, and also that I know several patient Griseldas who at this moment belong to no club, not even one given over to enlightening considerations of "bridge," because of their husbands' ideas concerning what is right and fitting for wives to do.

Young girls whose thoughts are on matrimony bent would do well, in my opinion, therefore, to care for their complexions and for the domestic virtues with about equal sollicitude. But they should not allow their affection for the latter to interfere with the cul-

M. Wilson.-Joseph Rodman Drake was a poet—a great poet—and a philosopher, too. He was born in New York in 1795, and died in 1820. In the brief period of his life he left a heritage in verse that should make his name live as long as the world of literature

Drake was a poet from childhood, and even his juvenile verses have a place among the classics. At the age of four-teen he wrote "The Mocking Bird," and "The Past and Present." If he had "The Past and Present." If he had ceased then to write his name would still be worthy of perpetuation. Collaborating with Halleck, he wrote a long series of verse entitled "The Croakers."
